The Belfast rioting, he argued, was based the chief difficulty, however, according to Tory sources, lies with the Parnellites themselves. The Government has no confidence in the power with the real Irish people. the fighting element in their own party, to say nothing of the party of action outside. A pro minent member of the new administration states that the Cabinet suspect that if home rule were granted, the Parnellites would be compelled by irresistible forces inside and outside, chiefly, however, in America, to enter into a combination with foreign Powers hostile to the sovereignty and integrity of the United Kingdom. It is firmly believed that collusion with the en--emies of Great Britain would be one of the first effects of homerule. There would be a repudiation of contracts, a failure to meet the obligations of Ireland to the United Kingdom under the Act constituting the Irish Legislature, a violation of the legal rights of landlords, and, in cousequance, anarchy, ending in a declaration of independence, civil war and a reconquest of the men. country, with all its attendant horrors for Ireland and dangers for Great Britain. Unless the cupy the disturbed districts. The presence of Parnellites take the opportunity now offered by the change of Government to meet the difficulty in a more practical manner, the prospects of home rule concessions by the party in power are most gloomy.
